From the ocean to the forests, from the Arctic to Connecticut's shores, climate change has gripped our entire planet. George Divoky spent more than 40 years watching birds in Alaska as the ice around him melted away. James Carlton traveled the world for decades and witnessed oceanic habitats shift in response to warmer waters. At home in New England, researcher Richard Primack is combining modern-day field observations with the journals of Henry David Thoreau to chronicle humanity's influence on our fields and forests.

Life After Live From Here:
A Conversation with Chris Thile

If you listen to public radio, you may recognize Chris Thile’s name. He was the host of Live From Here, not to mention his mind-boggling mandolin playing and his amazing band Punch Brothers. You can imagine how freakin’ thrilled I was to interview him live on-stage at the Jorgensen Center for the Performing Arts at UConn Storrs, and then again via Zoom from my dining room table.

Some of the country’s most celebrated court watchers explore how the court’s most recent verdicts could impact the way we live.

Although race and identity always have shaped U.S. politics, they reemerged four years ago with new intensity. In what was supposed to be Obama’s post-racial America as the pivot point of the election, they became the unapologetic driver of Donald Trump’s unexpected victory. Trump reenvisioned forces unleashed half a century ago as the Republicans pushed race and identity to the political forefront. A panel of nationally known voices discusses the role of race in American politics and how identity issues are shaping our daily lives.
